THE DAILY PROGRESS.

VOL. V. RALEIGH, SATURDAY, AUG. 13, 1864. NO. 135.

LAST AND WORST FROM RICH.

AUCTION AND PRIVATE SALE.

LARGE SALE OF WIRE AT AUCTION.

FOR SALE.

Headquarters Army Northern Va.,

TO RENT.

GOLD AXES—BRING IN YOUR OLD AXES.

STRAYED,

A FEW IMPORTANT FACTS

COOK AND WASHER WANTED.

PRINTING!

POWER PRESSES

Job Printing

NEW AUCTION & COMMISSION STORE.

AGENTS WANTED.

WOOL NOTICE.

SHOES! SHOES!

SURGERY FOR FIELD AND HOSPITAL.

ATTENTION!

GOVERNMENT OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

CITY OF RALEIGH.

LIBERTY SLIPPED WHILE ASLEEP.

THE BLOOD HAS YET TO BE WASHED OUT.

The Richmond Sentinel and Enquirer, of all papers in the Confederacy, utters an alarm that the people of the Confederacy, by their General Government, are about having their liberties taken away from them. It says:

Every body realized in his heart's core, before proclamation, that the time by the back door or the window, by the gradual encroachments of power, or by the sudden and open act of usurpation, that liberty would be taken from us. It—Liberty—was the virgin, daughter and children, husband and natural inheritance of the Union, and had been for generations. Every body knew that it was already dead, and that the Union was only a corpse, but a corpse that was dear to us, and which we could not bear to see buried out of our sight. The Northern people, who had been our friends, had always been our friends, and we could not believe that they would ever be our enemies. Even after the Federal army was marched into Virginia, and the Federal fleet was ready to sail from Hampton Roads, we could not believe that they would be our enemies. Even after the Federal army was marched into Virginia, and the Federal fleet was ready to sail from Hampton Roads, we could not believe that they would be our enemies. Even after the Federal army was marched into Virginia, and the Federal fleet was ready to sail from Hampton Roads, we could not believe that they would be our enemies.

The general sympathy for the Southern cause was universal. Women gladdened with their presence every camp, cheering the soldiers with their songs and cries from their windows and doors. Little boys and girls were running to and fro, some carrying the soldiers' dinners, others bringing water, many hurrying with fuel for the camp fires, and all manifesting delight and interest. The able and beautiful daughters of the Southern States and Southern cities were in the army of all the States, and every where they were received with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of joy. Every body knew that the people, without exception, were for the South, and that they were unanimous in their hatred of the Yankees. Every body knew that the Yankees were our enemies, and that they were the enemies of liberty. Every body knew that the Yankees were our enemies, and that they were the enemies of liberty.

Every body realized in his heart's core, before proclamation, that the time by the back door or the window, by the gradual encroachments of power, or by the sudden and open act of usurpation, that liberty would be taken from us. It—Liberty—was the virgin, daughter and children, husband and natural inheritance of the Union, and had been for generations. Every body knew that it was already dead, and that the Union was only a corpse, but a corpse that was dear to us, and which we could not bear to see buried out of our sight. The Northern people, who had been our friends, had always been our friends, and we could not believe that they would ever be our enemies. Even after the Federal army was marched into Virginia, and the Federal fleet was ready to sail from Hampton Roads, we could not believe that they would be our enemies. Even after the Federal army was marched into Virginia, and the Federal fleet was ready to sail from Hampton Roads, we could not believe that they would be our enemies.

The general sympathy for the Southern cause was universal. Women gladdened with their presence every camp, cheering the soldiers with their songs and cries from their windows and doors. Little boys and girls were running to and fro, some carrying the soldiers' dinners, others bringing water, many hurrying with fuel for the camp fires, and all manifesting delight and interest. The able and beautiful daughters of the Southern States and Southern cities were in the army of all the States, and every where they were received with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of joy. Every body knew that the people, without exception, were for the South, and that they were unanimous in their hatred of the Yankees. Every body knew that the Yankees were our enemies, and that they were the enemies of liberty. Every body knew that the Yankees were our enemies, and that they were the enemies of liberty.

Every body realized in his heart's core, before proclamation, that the time by the back door or the window, by the gradual encroachments of power, or by the sudden and open act of usurpation, that liberty would be taken from us. It—Liberty—was the virgin, daughter and children, husband and natural inheritance of the Union, and had been for generations. Every body knew that it was already dead, and that the Union was only a corpse, but a corpse that was dear to us, and which we could not bear to see buried out of our sight. The Northern people, who had been our friends, had always been our friends, and we could not believe that they would ever be our enemies. Even after the Federal army was marched into Virginia, and the Federal fleet was ready to sail from Hampton Roads, we could not believe that they would be our enemies. Even after the Federal army was marched into Virginia, and the Federal fleet was ready to sail from Hampton Roads, we could not believe that they would be our enemies.

The general sympathy for the Southern cause was universal. Women gladdened with their presence every camp, cheering the soldiers with their songs and cries from their windows and doors. Little boys and girls were running to and fro, some carrying the soldiers' dinners, others bringing water, many hurrying with fuel for the camp fires, and all manifesting delight and interest. The able and beautiful daughters of the Southern States and Southern cities were in the army of all the States, and every where they were received with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of joy. Every body knew that the people, without exception, were for the South, and that they were unanimous in their hatred of the Yankees. Every body knew that the Yankees were our enemies, and that they were the enemies of liberty. Every body knew that the Yankees were our enemies, and that they were the enemies of liberty.

Every body realized in his heart's core, before proclamation, that the time by the back door or the window, by the gradual encroachments of power, or by the sudden and open act of usurpation, that liberty would be taken from us. It—Liberty—was the virgin, daughter and children, husband and natural inheritance of the Union, and had been for generations. Every body knew that it was already dead, and that the Union was only a corpse, but a corpse that was dear to us, and which we could not bear to see buried out of our sight. The Northern people, who had been our friends, had always been our friends, and we could not believe that they would ever be our enemies. Even after the Federal army was marched into Virginia, and the Federal fleet was ready to sail from Hampton Roads, we could not believe that they would be our enemies. Even after the Federal army was marched into Virginia, and the Federal fleet was ready to sail from Hampton Roads, we could not believe that they would be our enemies.

The general sympathy for the Southern cause was universal. Women gladdened with their presence every camp, cheering the soldiers with their songs and cries from their windows and doors. Little boys and girls were running to and fro, some carrying the soldiers' dinners, others bringing water, many hurrying with fuel for the camp fires, and all manifesting delight and interest. The able and beautiful daughters of the Southern States and Southern cities were in the army of all the States, and every where they were received with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of joy. Every body knew that the people, without exception, were for the South, and that they were unanimous in their hatred of the Yankees. Every body knew that the Yankees were our enemies, and that they were the enemies of liberty. Every body knew that the Yankees were our enemies, and that they were the enemies of liberty.

Every body realized in his heart's core, before proclamation, that the time by the back door or the window, by the gradual encroachments of power, or by the sudden and open act of usurpation, that liberty would be taken from us. It—Liberty—was the virgin, daughter and children, husband and natural inheritance of the Union, and had been for generations. Every body knew that it was already dead, and that the Union was only a corpse, but a corpse that was dear to us, and which we could not bear to see buried out of our sight. The Northern people, who had been our friends, had always been our friends, and we could not believe that they would ever be our enemies. Even after the Federal army was marched into Virginia, and the Federal fleet was ready to sail from Hampton Roads, we could not believe that they would be our enemies. Even after the Federal army was marched into Virginia, and the Federal fleet was ready to sail from Hampton Roads, we could not believe that they would be our enemies.

The general sympathy for the Southern cause was universal. Women gladdened with their presence every camp, cheering the soldiers with their songs and cries from their windows and doors. Little boys and girls were running to and fro, some carrying the soldiers' dinners, others bringing water, many hurrying with fuel for the camp fires, and all manifesting delight and interest. The able and beautiful daughters of the Southern States and Southern cities were in the army of all the States, and every where they were received with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of joy. Every body knew that the people, without exception, were for the South, and that they were unanimous in their hatred of the Yankees. Every body knew that the Yankees were our enemies, and that they were the enemies of liberty. Every body knew that the Yankees were our enemies, and that they were the enemies of liberty.

Every body realized in his heart's core, before proclamation, that the time by the back door or the window, by the gradual encroachments of power, or by the sudden and open act of usurpation, that liberty would be taken from us. It—Liberty—was the virgin, daughter and children, husband and natural inheritance of the Union, and had been for generations. Every body knew that it was already dead, and that the Union was only a corpse, but a corpse that was dear to us, and which we could not bear to see buried out of our sight. The Northern people, who had been our friends, had always been our friends, and we could not believe that they would ever be our enemies. Even after the Federal army was marched into Virginia, and the Federal fleet was ready to sail from Hampton Roads, we could not believe that they would be our enemies. Even after the Federal army was marched into Virginia, and the Federal fleet was ready to sail from Hampton Roads, we could not believe that they would be our enemies.

The general sympathy for the Southern cause was universal. Women gladdened with their presence every camp, cheering the soldiers with their songs and cries from their windows and doors. Little boys and girls were running to and fro, some carrying the soldiers' dinners, others bringing water, many hurrying with fuel for the camp fires, and all manifesting delight and interest. The able and beautiful daughters of the Southern States and Southern cities were in the army of all the States, and every where they were received with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of joy. Every body knew that the people, without exception, were for the South, and that they were unanimous in their hatred of the Yankees. Every body knew that the Yankees were our enemies, and that they were the enemies of liberty. Every body knew that the Yankees were our enemies, and that they were the enemies of liberty.